Excerpt from The Centennial of Susquehanna County

When the chairmanship of the Centennial Executive Committee was offered to Capt. H. F. Beardsley he comprehended at once the magnitude of the work connected with it and modestly shrank from the responsibility, but, at the urgent request of his fellow-citizens, he reluctantly accepted the place.

To plan and carry out a celebration worthy of the event: to organize and complete a scheme by which the relics of the county were to be secured, classified, and placed on exhibition: to originate, arrange, and carry out a brilliant finale the grandest parade that ever marched within the bounds of the county: to gather together nearly three hundred of our oldest inhabitants and banquet them; to attend to the minute details of the greatest demonstration the northern tier has ever seen, and to raise, by subscription, the necessary funds to execute the splendid programme required a generous zeal and untiring energy possessed by a very few men, and, fortunately for the county, Captain Beardsley can be listed with that limited band.

In the execution of his plans he was strangely fortunate. There were selected as his assistants an executive and managing committee of gentlemen, the latter under the lead of the Hon. George A. Post; a ladies' auxiliary committee, presided over by Mrs. Henry Warner; a relic committee, in charge of Mrs. S. B. Chase, and a staff of assistant marshals, who were quick to perceive and prompt to execute his plans. It very seldom happens that a leader is supported so loyally through every step of an undertaking by a body of men and women combining so many qualities especially adapted to the service in which they were engaged. No antagonisms were produced by conflicting opinions; no hostilities engendered by unfortunate jealousies: no claims were raised or bitter assaults made, and no dampening spirit of indifference was displayed in any quarter. The committee, coming from all parts of the country were shown the duty goal, and every man and woman went toward it with zeal and determination.

The admirable work of the newspapers of the county our citizens must ever hold in cordial remembrance. They gave to the patriotic enterprise their helpful and potent influence, and to their constant assistance a share of the brilliant success of the Centennial is unquestionable due.
